

A Synthetic Manuscript for Reference-Extraction Benchmarking

Abstract

This synthetic manuscript exists only to exercise the reference-extraction pipeline against a document with realistic structure and an exactly known bibliography, generated from the entries in `entries.py`.

1 Introduction

The question taken up here has been approached from several directions, and the paragraphs below trace the line of work this manuscript builds on rather than restating each contribution in full. A closely comparable argument is developed by Foucault (1977). This reading sits comfortably beside the surrounding literature (Kuhn 1962). The argument is put most directly in a single passage (Said 1978, p. 14). The finding has since been replicated more than once (Barth 1956; Gadamer 1975).

2 Method

The procedure follows established practice at every step, so what matters in this section is which earlier report each decision was taken from. Earlier evidence points in this direction as well (Arendt 1958). The relevant table is reproduced there (Derrida 1976, p. 87). Two independent reports agree on this point (Eliade 1959; Ricoeur 1969).

3 Results

The pattern observed in these data is reported first and then placed against the findings it is meant to be read alongside. Earlier evidence points in this direction as well (Bloom 1973). The relevant table is reproduced there (Augustine 1961, p. 87). Two independent reports agree on this point (Nietzsche 1967; Heidegger 1962).

4 Discussion

What remains is to say which of the earlier claims the present data support and which of them they leave open. Earlier evidence points in this direction as well (Habermas 1984). The relevant table is reproduced there (Bultmann 1958, p. 87).
